THE FORMER SHERIFF COURT

Opening its doors for the first time in 1844, the building was erected to house the City's County Buildings. The block was extended all the way back from Wilson Street to Ingram Street later in the century. The erection of the City Chambers in George Square in 1888 led to a change of use for the County Buildings, and it made way to house Glasgow Sheriff Court and did so for the next 100 years or so.

The competition winning neo-classical design, by the Glasgow based partnership of William Clarke & George Bell, features an elevated portico sitting on a decorated plinth with a frieze of classical figures at street level.

After the closure and re-siting of the Glasgow Sheriff Court across the river in 1986 the site lay derelict for many years before being transformed into its current use today. The building now houses a mix of residential and commercial properties and also houses the Scottish Youth Theatre and one of the city's finest eateries.

Citation was opened in December 2007 and has defined itself as one of Glasgow's best Bar & Restaurants.
